

Bridgeborn Awarded Contract as part of Lockheed Martin team to support ARMY Integration Management Directorate (AIMD)

New business win uses Bridgeworks Visualization technology to help ARMY make better, more efficient decisions for current and future force.

Virginia Beach, VA – June 16th, 2009 – Bridgeborn, a leading systems design, engineering and integration company, today announced that it was awarded a sub-contract to support the US ARMY Architecture Integration Management Directorate (AIMD) out of TRADOC in Fort Monroe, VA. This new business win adds to Bridgeborn's list of current and recent customers within the US ARMY, which includes ARMY G2, G6, AIMD and flagship programs such as Future Combat Systems.

"We're very pleased to have been awarded this contract to support AIMD through our prime contractor, Lockheed Martin," said Bridgeborn Chief Scientist, Kevin Curry. "This business win speaks to the successful work we've done supporting ARMY G6 in a series of low risk, high reward feasibility assessments that have the goal of being transitioned into an operational utility within authorized system of record such as AIMD."

The Bridgeworks powered solution will use the combination of web services and visualization as well as Bridgeborn's proven, repeatable approach - ETLV (Extract, Transform, Load and Visualize) - to present critical data to senior leadership and decision makers through intuitive, interactive views and reports. Working in a Rapid Application Development (RAD) environment, Bridgeborn will develop solutions that help the ARMY make critical decisions about what is needed to equip the current and future force according to capabilities being set at all levels. These decisions are being used for support across multiple domains within the ARMY including doctrine, portfolio management and operations.
